

Manuscript Maps belonging to St. John's College, Oxford

By H. M. COLVIN

ALTHOUGH St. John's is not so rich in manuscript maps as some Oxford colleges,¹ there are in its muniment room over 60 maps relating to estates in ten different counties. Of these only three are of a date prior to 1700, but several of the eighteenth and early nineteenth century maps show unenclosed villages with their open fields, furlongs and yardlands, and No. 31 is remarkable as a survey of a manor drawn up 'immediately after the Jury had fixed Land Marks throughout the Common Fields'. Enclosure maps are also well represented, and the successive stages in the enclosure of North Oxford and its subsequent development for building purposes are illustrated by a notable series of maps (Nos. 42-54) which have yet to be used by local historians. With the exception of No. 1, none of the St. John's maps is of outstanding cartographical merit, but many of them are attractive specimens of the surveyor's art, and nearly every one has some feature—whether scale, cartouche, or merely the style of its lettering—which is ornamental in character.

In preparing this list, the compiler has taken as his model the admirable Catalogue of Maps in the Essex Record Office (1947). The heading of each entry indicates the parish in which the estate mapped lies, followed by a verbatim transcript of the title of the map, and the name of the surveyor, if known. The size of the map is given in inches, the first figure indicating height, the second breadth. Finally, there is a brief note on the character of the map, intended to indicate its value for the study of local topography, field-names or economic history.

This is the work of an amateur surveyor and is crudely and somewhat confusedly drawn with copious annotations. The main buildings of the manor house are indicated in a manner reminiscent of medieval illustration. There is a cartouche of the arms of Rawlinson impaling a coat (Or, on a chevron azure, three birds) believed to be that of Taylor.
